

Peer-Review Process – Africa Spectrum

It is the responsibility of the editorial team to maintain high editorial standards and to ensure that the journal fulfils its stated mission. When a paper is submitted, the editor first decides if it is suitable for inclusion and falls within the journal's remit. If the article is peripheral to the journal's area of interest, either it will be rejected immediately or the editor will ask the author to resubmit it after it has been revised.

After this step, the evaluation of research articles submitted is undertaken through a double-blind peer review. The editorial team selects two (sometimes three) independent reviewers who undertake research in the same area as the author and are subject specialists. In the double-blind process, all information in the paper which identifies the author is removed. The reviewers then judge the paper and return it to the editorial team, who pass the reviewers' anonymous comments back to the author. Anonymity is strictly maintained. Neither the author nor the reviewers know each other's identity.
